Remote.com

Dear Hiring Team,

I spent ten years at L'Oréal running a SAP HR to SuccessFactors data migration across more than forty countries, so a project about unifying benefits costs across multiple countries and brokers into one payroll platform is a problem I already know the shape of: messy source data, country rules that never map cleanly onto each other, and HR teams who need the new system to just work from day one.

The product I'm most proud of is WallOfTraders.com, a crypto trading platform I co-founded and owned as Product Manager end to end: I decided what shipped, wrote the specs, validated every feature against what our 10,000 users actually did with it, and ran regression tests using Postman. I don't code; that side was my cofounder's, which is exactly why writing specifications precise enough that engineering never has to guess has been my job for fifteen years, on both sides of the table.

I have not built a benefits administration platform before, but the underlying problem, reconciling several external data sources into one clean system of record, is the same one I solved moving forty countries from SAP HR to SuccessFactors. I would expect the ramp-up to be about the domain vocabulary, not the way of thinking.

I have worked fully remote for ten years, with my own desk at a coworking space and AI agents in my daily workflow, which fits how Remote.com itself operates. I live in Anglet, in France, and I speak French and English fluently.

I'd genuinely enjoy a conversation about the role.

Kind regards,

Gaëtan FRANÇOIS
