

Dear Hiring Team,

For ten years, I was the person on the other side of the table. As the global account owner for L'Oréal's SAP HR platform across 40+ countries, I sat through countless solution presentations, evaluated every pitch from SAP and its partners, and decided which capabilities to deploy and which to pass on. I know exactly what makes an enterprise client say yes - and what makes them tune out.

That experience is what I'd bring to the Principal Solution Advisor role. I understand HCM not as a product spec sheet but as a set of decisions that HR directors and CIOs have to justify internally. At L'Oréal, I translated complex system capabilities into business cases that worked across five continents and a dozen legal frameworks. Building a compelling narrative around SAP HCM for a prospect is the same exercise, from the other side.

On the demonstration and pre-sales side: I've led executive-level business reviews with senior stakeholders at one of the world's largest consumer groups, managed escalations under pressure, and consistently positioned SAP solutions as the answer to problems clients hadn't fully articulated yet. I don't have a formal pre-sales title in my background - I come from the client organisation. But I'd argue that ten years as a strategic account owner at the scale of L'Oréal is a better preparation for this role than most.

My French is native, my English is fluent, and I use generative AI tools daily - including for building client-facing content and preparing for complex conversations. I co-founded WallOfTraders.com, a SaaS startup, which gave me a different angle on the product adoption and user behaviour questions that come up in every HCM deal.

I'd genuinely enjoy a conversation about the role.
